Ukraine – The writing assistant company's new Kiev office features versatile recreational spaces for employees, including nap pods, a library and a soundproof music room.

Designed by Ukrainian architects Balbek Bureau, Grammarly's Kiev office joins the company's bases in San Francisco and New York. It diverges from the typically corporate nature of other local workspaces by allowing staff to take time out to relax and re-energise alongside their working hours.

Although the space includes nap pods, a concept previously implemented by Silicon Valley offices, it also offers a library and soundproof music room, which can be used to watch films or play musical instruments. 'We use the space to rehearse for events and celebrations, to take creative breaks during the day, and as a place to appreciate and play music with our colleagues,' a representative from Grammarly tells LS:N Global.

Workplaces are finding new ways to celebrate their employees beyond their day-to-day roles, and encouraging musical play is another innovative way for brands to do this.
